It was perhaps a little more difficult

Francisco than from Norwich to Denver to San Ver, but the actual construction of the line was the least of the engineers troubles. His real problem was to make the line "talk," to send something 2,000 miles with a breath as the motive power. In effect, that voyage of the voice across the continent is instantaneous; if its speed could could be accurately measured, a fifteenth of a second would probably be nearly exact. If it were possible for sound to carry that far, a "hello" uttered in Norwich and travelling through the air without the aid of wires and electricity, would not reach San Francisco until four hours later. The telephone not only transmits the speed.

But, while the telephone is breaking speed records, it must also guarantee safe delivery to these millions of little passages it carries every few minutes in the way of sound waves created at the rate of 2,100 a second. The engineer in telephony cannot increase his motive power. A breathagainst a metal disk changes air waves into electrical currents and these electrical currents millions of waves into electrical currents and these electrical currents, millions of which are required for a single conversation, must be carried across the continent and produce the same sounds in San Francisco as were made in Norwich.
